Abstract:

The exclusion of illegally obtained evidence has long been the focus of theoretical research and legislative reform in China. After years of effort, exclusionary rule of illegally obtained confession has finally found its root in Chinese statute. However, as is true elsewhere, it's always much harder to operationalize the rules than just to establish them on paper. This paper is based on a thorough and in-depth empirical survey across the country. After an overview of the establishment process as the backdrop, this paper will share some empirical findings on the implementation of exclusionary rule of illegally obtained confession. This part will address three core issues: the definition and scope of illegally obtained confession, proof of illegally obtained confession, and suppression hearing. The author will also seriously examine the contributing factors causing the failure of implementation, identify the existing challenges China encountered in implementing the new rules, and then put forward some potential solutions to these problems based on comparative study.
