

Emotion Politics: Joyous Resistance in Hong Kong

Vitrierat Ng and Kin-man Chan

Abstract

This study explores the role of emotion in political mobilization by studying People Power, a radical group in Hong Kong. The group abandoned their disruptive approach and adopted a new tactic of social movement—joyous resistance—which attracted large numbers of participants and thus became a powerful political force exerting great pressure on the government. This case shows that festive emotion can be an intangible resource that reduces the cost of participation compared with confrontational tactics. The cathartic function of joyous resistance also reduces the potential for violence during mobilization. After the Umbrella Movement, there has been debate on whether more confrontational or even violent tactics should be adopted in social movements. The idea of joyous resistance will remain an important option for social movement organizers considering the sustainability of mobilization in a moderate society such as Hong Kong.

Vitrierat Ng is Teaching Fellow in the School of General Education and Languages at Technological and Higher Education Institute of Hong Kong (THEi). Her research focuses on social movement and general education. Correspondence should be addressed to vitrierat_ng@vtc.edu.hk.

Kin-man Chan received his PhD from Yale University and is Associate Professor of Sociology at The Chinese University of Hong Kong. He is former director of Universities Service Center for China Studies and Centre for Civil Society Studies in the same university. His research focuses on civil society and democratization in Chinese societies.