In recent years, technology has disrupted many industries, from retail (Amazon) to taxis (Uber) to hotels (Airbnb). Many observers believe that technology will bring similar changes to the legal industry, including to dispute resolution, an area that is traditionally thought to be the sole province of highly trained human judges or arbitrators exercising good judgment honed through years of experience. But is this promise overhyped? This talk examines whether new technology such as online dispute resolution platforms or artificial intelligence really threatens to disrupt the dispute resolution industry, from the perspective of a practitioner of US litigation and international arbitration.

ABOUT THE SPEAKERS:

Sabrina Lee is a counsel in the International Arbitration group of WilmerHale. She represents clients in diverse industries in international commercial arbitrations conducted in venues throughout the world. She has also represented clients in international litigation and arbitration-related proceedings in US federal court. She frequently handles matters involving Asian parties, and she has particular expertise in handling matters involving complex damages or other quantitative issues.
