Recent research has highlighted the valuable role that synchronous computer-mediated communication (SCMC) can play in second language learning. While the advantages of using SCMC for second language communication opportunities are well documented, little is known about how students engage in tasks via SCMC. The current study examines the communication strategies (CS) used to promote and manage communication in an SCMC-based group discussion task in the context of a Malaysian tertiary EFL class for engineering students. The findings reveal that, although the pattern of use is different from that found in previous studies of CS in face-to-face communication, CS are frequently used in the SCMC-based task indicating that SCMC can provide a rich and communicatively challenging environment for task engagement. These results emphasize the importance of the careful development and use of communicative tasks in SCMC to promote language practice.
