Abstract

Being theorized as one of the global cities, Hong Kong has long prided itself as a cosmopolitan city bridging China and the World and capitalized on such a self-positioning. At the same time, Hong Kong people have formed a deep sense of local identity revolving around the specific history, culture, and ethos of the city. Hong Kong's simultaneous situatedness between the local and the global has created both opportunities and tension for sociologists, who are sometimes torn between the dilemma of wanting to conduct research of local relevance and aspirations to speak to a global academic community. Could the local and the global be productively combined to generate knowledge that is relevant for both the local and global audience? If so, how could this be achieved amid a time when Hong Kong society is undergoing rapid social changes? This panel invites three generations of sociologists to share their thinking on this issue, their strategies of conducting sociological research on Hong Kong that simultaneously attends to the issues of the local and speaks to an audience of the global, and their reflections on future paths ahead.
